To MMS

Let me start by saying that I back up the new Performace training that MMS is trying to implement. I still feel (and want to go on record) that MMS should not drop the accreditation process. As was said at the workshop in Houston " What kind of school would we have, if there were no accreditation, would you send your child to such a place? " If the answer is No then what makes you think that the Oil Co. will send their personal. By keeping the MMS accreditation on the schools it helps keep some guide and uniformity on what is being taught. The idea of having a continuing or progressive form of training could be what it takes to keep everyone up with their job and safety practices.

Also something that was touched on (in Houston) is there is a problem with the inspectors, they are inconsistent with their interpretations between districts and between inspectors in there respective district. One dose not know what is to be done. I guess that by not having an accredited school it will make it easier to get away from the problem, or could it make it even worse.
